CONVICT WINS PARDON.

Governor Tyler, of Virginia, Rewards a Prisoner for an Act of Bravery.

At the state farm of Virginia the other day a highly dramatic scene took place which changed the position of the Quincey Bailey from that of a convict to a free man and a hero. Gov. Taylor and the penitentiary board went up to the state farm to inspect it. When the distinguished guests arrived several of the officers and guards went out to receive them officially, and four big convicts took advantage of this opportunity to make their escape. They seized rifles belonging to the guards, and defying everybody, made a dash for liberty in full view of the governor and his attendants.

Bailey seized a repeating rifle near at hand and exclaimed: "I'll capture the leader, or never come back alive." Bailey is a big, athletic fellow. He was sent to the penitentiary for one year for manslaughter, but has been a good prisoner, and was a trusty about the state farm. A hot race followed, and Bailey captured the leader. Meantime the guards, finding that the other men were gaining on them, had the farm's bloodhounds turned loose, and the fugitives were brought in and will be given, in accordance with the law, five years' additional sentence for their attempt to escape.

The governor advanced and com-mended Bailey for his heroism and loyalty. "You have done well, my man," he said, "and you shall this day be a free man." The governor sent a tele-phone message to his secretary direct-ing that pardon papers be at once made out for Bailey, and the pardoned man accompanied the governor and board to Richmond, with a railroad ticket to his home in Greenville county.
